

Med Frenzy

Synopsis

Kendra, a single lady, has her social life compromised when she encounters a rare skin disorder that cannot be diagnosed. She experiences much evidence that parasites are her problem, but a plethora of medical professionals deny her claim and think that she is psychotic.

While unable to get medical help, she endures several episodes of bugs biting her, invading her home, and showing up in her skin. She does her best to cover this up with all those she meets except for a confidant girlfriend who tries to advise her. She struggles with this affliction for years, having to use her own remedies.

Trying to live a normal life, she continues to meet single men, some of whom are connected with the medical profession. She meets a dentist, a podiatrist, and an exterminator, and some of their antics provide comedic relief for an otherwise serious problem.

In the world of a small Research Foundation, the Center for Disease Control and Big Pharma, the identified fibers are thought to be man made, a genetically engineered species for a specific purpose. The true cause of this disease is not being disclosed, there is conjecture of a cover-up, and the perpetrator is too big and protected to take on legally.

Kendra becomes tired of dealing with people in the medical field, but meets and falls in love with a businessman who turns out to be the head of a medical staff. Through him, she gets an opportunity for retaliation when she is asked to speak at a national medical conference and unexpectedly verbally attacks the physicians in attendance for violating their oath to help people.
